RESEARCH

Current Research

My research interests are broadly focused on interpersonal relationships and cultural diversity. Within interpersonal relationships, I am specifically interested in couple rituals, chemistry, infidelity, and marriage. I enjoy studying how each of these topics varies by culture, not only within North America, but also across the world. My goal is to understand how evolutionary mechanisms interact with sociocultural practices to influence the development and maintenance of interpersonal relationships. As such, my research is generally guided by theories of evolutionary psychology, symbolic interaction, and social exchange. I consider myself a mixed methods researcher and have experience with qualitative, quantitative, and mixed methods studies.

I am currently working on five projects: 1) examining the influence of couple rituals on individual and relationship well-being for distressed and non-distressed couples, 2) developing and validating a short version of the Couple Rituals Scale, 3) examining the role of rituals in relationship dissolution, 4) conducting a theoretical and empirical comparison of couple rituals, relational maintenance behaviors, commitment behaviors, and couple behaviors, and 5) identifying the underlying components of interpersonal chemistry in friendships and romantic relationships.

Past Research Experience

Research Assistant, University of Georgia, Dr. David W. Wright, 2004-2008. Conceptualized and conducted research on couple rituals and interpersonal relationship processes.

Research Assistant, The University of British Columbia, Dr. Sheila Marshall and Dr. James Ponzetti, 2000-2001. Reviewed scholarly journal articles and composed a list of published parenting measures.

Research Assistant, The University of British Columbia, Dr. Daniel Perlman, 1998. Reviewed academic books, chapters, and articles and composed a spreadsheet of the most commonly cited family scholars.
